Property Owners Who Fail to Make Wills

When the late Edwin Hawley died there ensued among his heirs, and others who were not his lawful heirs, an unseemly scramble for his estate. It appeared that the dead man had left no will. Here is an episode which warrants thoughtful consideration.

Mr. Hawley began life as a messenger-boy and rose to be a railway magnate of far-reaching interests. From his boyhood he struggled hard, and as the years passed he consecrated all his resources to wealth-getting. He succeeded, but at a fearful price. He denied himself pleasure, culture and the leisurely enjoyment of the best things in

Money and power were his passion. Yet the irony of all his endeavor is that when he passed away the millions for passed away the millions for which he sacrificed himself became the hone of bitter dis-pute, with only the letter of the law to disperse them, and with the probability that much of the estate will be wasted in the law to disperse them, and with the probability that much of strife.

Obviously such confusion could hardly have been Mr. Hawley's intent. Yet what else did he expect to result from his failure to provide proper instructions for his heirs or executors? It was an extraordinary piece of neglect on the part of so keen and strenuous a man of busines.

It would be still more extraordinary if it were not a familiar fact that many people have a deep-seated feeling against the making of a will, and will grasp at any excuse for postponing or evading it. They seem to regard it as a procedure which means that their life is ended, or is approaching its end. By no test of logic or common sense is such an idea anything more than a superstitious weakness, utterly unworthy of a practical man or woman.

To the possessor of any property, to fail to make a will is to shirk a duty. The ownership of property is a responsibility, and so is its proper distribution at the owner's death. It is a man's work to meet such responsibilities with intelligent and thoughtful courage.- Editorial from Munsey's Magazine
